

The Lumbees face the Klan

Nicholas Graham, "January 1958: The Lumbees face the Klan (see <http://www.lib.unc.edu/ncc/ref/nchistory/jan2005/jano5.html>). " This Month in North Carolina History, January 2005.

PROVIDED BY UNC LIBRARIES / NORTH CAROLINA COLLECTION

On the night of January 13, 1958, crosses were burned on the front lawns of two Lumbee Indian families in Robeson County, N.C. Nobody had to ask who was responsible. The Ku Klux Klan had risen again in North Carolina, its ranks swelling after the 1954 Supreme Court decision in Brown v. Board of Education calling for the desegregation of public schools. While the Court instructed schools to proceed with "all deliberate speed," the Klan fought — often in the form of anonymous nighttime attacks — to slow the process of integration.

Robeson County in the 1950s had a uniquely tri-racial population. There were about 40,000 whites, 30,000 Native Americans, and 25,000 African Americans, each group with its own separate school system. Although the Klan had typically targeted African Americans, in early 1958 a group led by James W. "Catfish" Cole of South Carolina began harassing the Lumbees. One of the crosses burned on the night of January 13 was on the lawn of a Lumbee family that had recently moved into a predominantly white neighborhood, while the other was intended to intimidate a Lumbee woman who was said to have been dating a white man. Not content to leave it at this, the Klan planned a rally in Robeson County to be held just a few days later.

The rally was scheduled for the night of January 18, 1958, in a field near Maxton, N.C. The stated purpose of the gathering was, in the words of Catfish Cole, "to put the Indians in their place, to end race mixing." The time and location of the rally was not kept secret, and word spread quickly among the local Lumbee population.

Reports vary about the number of people gathered on that cold night, but there were thought to have been around a hundred Klan members. They brought a large banner emblazoned with "KKK" and a portable generator, which powered a public address system and a single bare light bulb. When the meeting began, the arc of the dim light didn't spread far enough for the Klansmen to see that they were surrounded by as many as a thousand Lumbees. Several young tribe members, some of whom were armed, closed on the Klan meeting and tried to take down the light bulb. The groups fought, and a shotgun blast shattered the light. In the sudden darkness, the Lumbees descended upon the field, yelling and firing guns into the air, scattering the overmatched Klansmen. Some left under police protection while others, including Catfish Cole, simply took to the woods.

News photographers already on the scene captured the celebration. Images of triumphant Lumbees holding up the abandoned KKK banner were published in newspapers and magazines throughout the world. Simeon Oxendine, a popular World War II veteran, appeared in Life magazine, smiling and wrapped in the banner. The rout of the Klan galvanized the Lumbee community. The Ku Klux Klan was active in North Carolina into the 1960s, but they never held another public meeting in Robeson County.

From Life magazine

Bad Medicine for the Klan: North Carolina Indians Break Up Ku Kluxers' anti-Indian Meeting† (Life magazine, January 27, 1958)

thumbnail

Trouble between the Indians and the Ku Klux Klan had been simmering for a week in Robeson County, N.C. In its continuing efforts to keep Robeson County's three-way segregation rigid, the Klan had recently burned crosses to warn an Indian family that moved into a white neighborhood and an Indian woman who dated a white man.

---

On the web

The Ku Klux Klan in North Carolina and the Battle of Maxton Field

<http://www.ncmuseumofhistory.org/collateral/articles/fo4.ku.klux.klan.battle.maxton.field.pdf>

From Tar Heel Junior Historian magazine.

North Carolina's Lumbee fight for justice: The Battle at Hayes Pond in Maxton, NC

<http://www.sog.unc.edu/programs/civiced/resources/docs/Lumbee.pdf>

Little known about our state's history is the brave confrontation North Carolina's Lumbee staged to protest a KKK rally near Maxton, NC on the night of January 18, 1958. In this lesson from the North Carolina Civic Education Consortium, students learn about North Carolina's Lumbee and their heroic resistance to hatred and bigotry on this night, known as "The Battle of Hayes Pond." Students will explore the night's events as well as design an active citizenship award to honor the Lumbee for their vigilance in fighting for their rights.

The Battle of Maxton Field

<http://www.wku.edu/~smithch/MALVINA/mrou.htm>

Folk singer Malvina Reynolds wrote this song about the Lumbees' rout of the Klan.

Victory over the Ku Klux Klan

<http://www.uncp.edu/nativemuseum/collections/victory/index.htm>

A brief history with interviews from the Museum of the Native American Resource Center at UNC-Pembroke.

More from LEARN NC

Visit us on the web at www.learnnc.org to learn more about topics related to this article, including American Indians, Ku Klux Klan, Lumbee, North Carolina, Robeson County, and history.

Notes

1. See <http://books.google.com/books?id=5VUEAAAAMBAJ&pg=26#v=onepage&q=&f=false>.